

What if the world had no borders?

The world with no boundaries would lead to both peace and chaos. If there were no boundaries, there would be no fights between different countries to expand their regions, which would lead to global peace, as war only does harm to humanity through destruction of livelihood, loss of family members, increase in the number of refugees, etc. If there were no boundaries, different people would be able to live together; people with different cultures, mindsets, and religions would be able to relate to each other, resulting in an increase in the secular nature among people.

However, a world with no boundaries would also lead to chaos, as managing such a large population would be difficult. Administration would be hard to handle, and crises like poverty, lack of basic necessities (food, water, clothes, and shelter), and inadequate medical facilities reaching different parts of the world would result in an increase in death rate, infant mortality rate, and maternal mortality rate (MMR). There would also be a need to settle intercommunity conflicts among people which could lead to social, emotional, and political instability. It would be difficult to make up one government, and the interest of many people would be ignored, and it would be impossible for the government to end up on one decision. The education system would collapse, and the illiteracy rate would increase rapidly. The world with no boundaries would definitely increase humanity and brotherhood among people, as nature doesn't differentiate between countries, states, regions, age, etc. We also shouldn't do that, but such a world would lead to total chaos, leading to crises all along people.
