Topic – A Day without electricity in Summer

One sizzling summer afternoon, the electricity suddenly went off in our area, at first, everyone thought the power supply would return in a few minutes, but the power cut lasted for many hours. With the power gone, the fans stopped, the rooms grew stifling, and the whole house felt suffocating. I began sweating and grew increasingly restless because the air conditioner and cooler were not working.

I could not watch television, use my tablet, or even charge my devices. My younger brother became restless and kept asking when the electricity would return. Managing the kitchen became challenging because the refrigerator was not cooling properly. My mother quickly prepared cold lemonade and cut juicy watermelon to help us stay cool.

After some time, we decided not to complain and instead make the best of the situation. We opened all the windows and sat together in the balcony where a light breeze was blowing. My grandmother shared funny stories from her childhood when people lived happily without so many electrical gadgets. Listening to her stories was interesting.

In the evening, my father brought candles, and we all played indoor games like Ludo, chess, and cards together. We laughed a lot and enjoyed spending quality time as a family. Since there were no mobile phones or television to distract us, everyone talked more and felt closer to each other.

After dinner, we went to the terrace to enjoy the cool night air. The sky looked beautiful and full of shining stars. We even saw the bright moon glowing peacefully. It was such a lovely sight that I had never noticed properly before because I usually spend evenings watching television or using gadgets.

That day taught me an important lesson. Electricity is extremely useful in our daily life, and we should never waste it. I also learned that happiness does not always come from electronic devices. True happiness lies in simple moments like sharing laughter, bonding with family, and appreciating nature.
